Partner with local iwi from the outset

Develop reciprocal relationships with local hapū and iwi. Learn about iwi education strategic plans and how as a team you can support them.

Seek guidance on how to do this respectfully.

The following resources and videos illustrate how other communities are navigating this journey:

- James Hargest High School
- Melanie Taite-Pitama, student achievement function practitioner at the Ministry of Education talking about how schools can build and strengthen a relationship with local marae or hapū

Have the right people at the table

Determining who will be part of the learning support community team will require a lot of discussion.

Possible collaborators could include:

- ✓ Leadership representatives from each early learning service, school, or kura
- ✓ Learning support coordinators or facilitators
- ✓ Iwi services
- ✓ Disability support groups
- ✓ Alt Ed and activity centre leaders
- ✓ Local religious or youth leaders
- ✓ Ministry of Education specialists (e.g., speech-language therapist, senior advisor: refugee and migrant support, learning support services, learning support roles, local Ministry of Education offices)
- ✓ Resource teachers: learning and behaviour
- ✓ Local medical, child and adolescent mental health services
- ✓ Local social work services
- ✓ Ākonga and whānau representation

Make your network of relationships visible

Mapping connections.

Every early learning service, school, and kura will have established learning support processes and teams within its community. View this example from Te Kauwhata College.

Each school will also have relationships with other groups, such as ASD specialists or youth group leaders.

As a school, document or create a map of your key relationships that you can share with the learning support community team.

This will enable the team to see common relationships and identify areas of knowledge and expertise (in areas such as dyslexia or NZSL).

Reflection questions

Reflect on what you will need to uncover and discuss to enable partnership and collaboration.

Learning partnerships flourish when power is shared and the principle of ako – reciprocal learning and teaching – is in play.

- How will these principles underpin your learning community team's interactions?
- How will you know?
