Being critically conscious

Critical consciousness involves:

- reflecting critically on the imbalance of power and resources in society
- taking critical action in the pursuit of equity
- disrupting the status quo to address oppression and strengthen equity.

Challenge the status quo

Conscientisation is becoming aware of the part we play in keeping things the same. How we support the status quo, how we perpetrate that. And becoming very conscious of how and why we are doing that and what are the implications of our actions.

Conscientisation may make us aware, but if we're not going to do anything with that thinking we're of very little help to our students. Resistance is the “doing” following the disruption to our practice on account of the conscientisation.

Reflective questions

Consider your responses to these questions. What actions do they inspire?

What have I been doing unconsciously that I need to unlearn or that I need to undo, so that I can be sure that I am supporting Pacific learners to succeed as Pacific learners?

What are the things that I need to do differently?

What can I do in order to disrupt the status quo?
