Support student interactions

A student's social development influences how they interact with others. Social contexts and differences (such as ASD or dyslexia) will shape a student's behaviour.

When a student seems uncomfortable in social situations, consider:

- Are the social expectations mis-matched to the student's stage of development?
- Have the social expectations been explained in ways the student can understand?
- Do they have the skills, including vocabulary, to participate equitably?
- Have they had opportunities to learn and practise the range of social skills needed in a particular context?

Targeted social skills teaching

Some students may need targeted teaching of social skills. For example, students with autism spectrum disorder (ASD) often need specific teaching to learn how to initiate interactions and share and take turns.

- ✓ Define one or more social behaviours the student needs to learn, in measurable terms.
- ✓ Use a range of teaching techniques (for example, structured discussions, social stories).
- ✓ Facilitate the generalisation of social skills to peers through role-playing and video modeling.
- ✓ Transition from a structured teaching situation to everyday situations – the student may need supports to achieve this.
- ✓ Check for social validity – can the student use the new skills in different situations?

Ideas to support self management

When students have strong social skills, they feel more confident negotiating and problem-solving in difficult situations.

Provide specific teaching to:

- teach assertiveness – practise saying “no” to things they know are wrong
- instill resiliency – practise strategies for facing difficult situations
- model empathy – discuss how they feel in different situations and help them to identify how others may feel
- practise problem-solving – students need to know how to identify their feelings and manage their impulses.
